The proposed BCAP Code fails to protect children and those under the age of 18 because it continues to broadcast strong sexual material and adult-sex material. As result, young people are not being given any moral compass and their impressionable mind is influenced by what they see on TV. The consequences are shown by for example a study which found that teens who watch Sex in the City are more likely to get pregnant. Recent figures in Feburary 2009 have also shown that the pregnancy rate among under-16s has risen 6.4 per cent in one year. It is also not acceptable that it shown after the watershed, as children are not prevented from watching television after that time unless their parents are aware of the dangers and are conscientious.

Instead, this material should be reserved for adult channels that have mandatory access restrictions such as encryption and pin codes. It would appear that the legislation both here and in the AVMS Directive provide support for this approach.

I am also stongly opposed to the proposed profit-motivated abortion advertising which deeply offends citizens holding a belief system grounded in sincerely held religious tenets.

Particularly as it is influential in young people taking the view that they don't have to worry about the consequences of sexual activity as abortion is so accessible and it is at a time when there is increasing concern about repeated teenage abortions. For example, ONS reports said 50 per cent of pregancies led to an abortion in 2007. It also ignores the serious mental health implications of abortion.

Commercial pandering of abortion and related services should, therefore, be prohibited.
