I considered following the format laid out in your consultation, I then realised that my view could be put quite simply in a very few words.

In this country, we have gradually, through the medium of television, films and literature, taken childhood from our children. They learn what we teach. Year on year, sexual education in schools starts earlier for children who, should, and otherwise would, be mostly ignorant of sexual matters.

When they should be playing with dolls prams and toy motor cars, we introduce the confusing and mind-blowing subject of sex.

I personally would prefer that we have no sexually explicit material on our televisions but if we must have the option in this brave new world of ours, the watershed time of nine pm seems eminently sensible to me. Before that time in the evening, we should see no sexual material of any kind. Children should not have the ability to come across adverts for condoms or abortions or films or programmes with sexually explicit or violent material in them.

A child left watching a suitable film or CBBCs with access to the remote control could inadvertently turn to a programme containing inappropriate material.

Retail outlets selling films and games containing violence or sexually explicit material should be legally responsible for selling to a minor under the age of sixteen. Parents or other adults buying such material with the intention of allowing children under sixteen to use this material should also be subject to criminal proceedings. Hard as this would be to police, the suggestion would be a deterrent for some.

Each child is a sponge soaking up knowledge, each parent or carer should be the tap controlling the feed and assessing when a child is ready to assume responsibility for that knowledge.
