

Dear OFCOM,

I shall keep this simple and sweet, first I would like to state, I do not infringe copyrights via the internet.

Here's my problem, the united nations have stated that, Internet Access is a basic human right, I agree with this, but the DEA will start destroying access by cutting and/or slowing subscribers speeds down.

I think that part should be removed. I understand that many people infringe copyrights, but look at it from a different point of view, the companies that support and 'want' this to go through know that with the fast changes in technology and the way users are consumer their media soon, perhaps in the next 3-5 years almost everybody will be on subscription based programs, basically allowing them to access everything, even the newest releases of media, programs, etc.

There is plenty of evidence out there, showing that file sharing, etc can be beneficial. It's just there are a few select people who take the biscuit, by downloading ridiculous amounts of media.

So here's my point, leave the little people alone, who might have only downloaded it a few times, even up to a 100 times. Perhaps they can't afford it at that moment in time, yes I know it's wrong, it doesn't mean they won't pass it on in the future, by actually buying the content, but threatening them with legal action will end up looking idiotic. What should be done is the people who are abusing it, by downloading gigabytes, They should be targeted and warned.

Thanks.
