

The primary provisions given by this legislation are already largely present in existing law (namely the pursuance of infringers by copyright holders).

Many extra provisions given are ill thought out and/or incomplete, with important and serious technical, implementation and definition details dangerously deferred (e.g., handling of libraries, wireless security levels, etc.). These will generate unnecessary financial burdens.

This law was rushed through by a dying government, has largely been taken over by events, and needs to go completely back to the drawing board.
