

Why should anyone pay £20 to defend against an unsubstantiated accusation based solely on IP evidence which has already been discredited? Given that IP cannot possibly identify the infringer, how can any CIR sent out possibly meet the requirement that the accountholder can reasonably be suspected of either performing the act or permitting another to do so? Is this not the approach of ACS Law which saw it's principle banned from practice for two years?