Additional comments:

This is totally crazy, it seems to assume in the first case that anyone downloading anything is doing it illegally, and then puts the onus on the downloader to prove they are not.

What about downloading copies of material I already own?

What about downloading material that I have paid for as an electronic copy?

What about downloading material for study that is out of print or otherwise unobtainable?

What about 'fair use', downloading small clips of copywrited material for showing to students?

In order to tell if what people are doing online is legal or illegal will require a lot of work on *each individual case*. This includes checking where and from whom the download is made.

If I am walking home from the shops with a DVD in my bag, would I have to expect the police to stop me and make a record of what I have and then notify the film maker that I was seen in public with it, so that they can then contact me to check that I had bought it from a legally certified seller?
