

Harry Collett

On approaching my 77th year I cannot think that any other technology introduced in my lifetime has helped change my life as much as Television. This wonderful medium, from it being made available to the masses in the early 1950s to the present day, has opened up the whole World visually to the human race. How could anyone over the age of 60 think otherwise?

Now in retirement I have within the last five years, found my lifestyle changed quite radically by Computers. For example, my partial physical disability is overcome by having to go no further than my PC to Bank and shop for every commodity I will ever need. Information on everything in this world I wish to know about is only a few clicks away. Entertainment in the form of Music, Games, Films, Photography and the ability to communicate with millions of other people worldwide almost instantly has changed my lifestyle completely.

Only many more subsidised efforts will convince people of all age groups that “Computers don’t Bite or Sting” also Glossaries explaining mysterious IT Jargon distributed widely, will help change and enhance the lives of millions more of our Countrymen, as this miraculous technology has changed mine.
